The handsome residence of Martin Fessler, stuated at the corner of Twestin South and Fifth East was burned to the ground vesteriacy morning. Shortly after the blaze was observed, the friends and neighbors of the family formed an impromptu bugade and quenched the stems after saving all the furniture in the house But after all had gone away the wind funned the embers into thame and the next place was soon burned to the ground. The fire is supposed to be the result of a deficitive flue.

The people who have left the old beaten mossback paths for the broad avenues of advancement and common sense are those who are enjoying the many blessings of nature. Our fore-fathers journeyed across the wild, dreary desolate plains with ox teams but their sons, and daughters doo't have to, and when we see some good old "waybacks" who climst to the old methods of living or traveling a emile passes over our countenances and we are very apt to murmur will he or she ever know berter? True, it takes all kinds to make up this great world, but our clizens should be in the vanguard of progression and show to the world that the soil, climate and air of Utah produces leaders in the battle of life.

Nature has done much for this territory. Many gifts lie at our feet unit seems that an operation could prove of no benefit.

was attempting to take a man into custody. The circumstances connected with the affair are, in the main his stated in The Heraid, although there are some small matters of detail which will be of interest. It appears the man Gavin was after is named Doyle and he was making a great disturbance when the officer came in. "You will have to come along with me," said Gavin. "Well, I guess not, no s— of a b—can take me," was the answer Doyle made. Gavin took hold of his man, when the fellow began making a fight in which he attempted to draw a kulfe. The former drew his gun and hit Doyle over the head and shoulders. As he did so, the weapon exploded and Doyle and Morrissey both fell to the earth. "You've got him," remarked a bystandet. "Yes, and my God, Simon, you have got me too," feebly spoke Morrissey. Those were the last words the poor man ever uttered on earth. It was found the bullet had ente ed his body at a point just below the breast bone, had ranged upplard through the heart and lodged-sinder the skin on the left side. The jury found a verdict of accidental shooting, and mentioned the fact of there being no felonious intent. Gavin and the dead man had been friends all their lives and never had a wrong word.
